POTB RAIL SERVICE RESUMES IN BANKS

On April 14, 2008 the Port of Tillamook Bay resumed rail service to the Banks Lumber Company in Banks, Oregon. Since the December, 2007 storm event, the Port railroad had not moved any cars due to the extensive damage of the rail spur through the Salmonberry Canyon area. The railroad had locomotive POTB 6164 stationed in Banks and provided rail service from the Banks Lumber Company site to the interchange area. As of July 17, a total of 60 rail cars have interchanged. According to Roadmaster John Lewis, "Between Marvin Hahn, Aaron Zorko, Josh Balmer and myself, we keep these railcars moving to our customer. It has been very important to the Port Board and Staff Members for us to keep our railroad providing rail service."

DEBRIS CLEARANCE

If you hear that familiar train engine whistle and wonder what the work trains are doing in the area from Salmonberry to Tillamook, they are clearing the woody debris from the rail right-of-way from the December 2007 storm event.

Earlier the Port crews had cleared the railroad tracks of fallen trees and debris to provide access and now the crews are going back and removing all this debris from the rail road right-of-way. According to Roadmaster John Lewis, an estimated 2,245 cubic yards of material has been removed from the railroad right-of-way. All the material is loaded on the rail cars and deposited at a central location for burning and disposal.
